

Quarterly Operating Review

The quarter closed ahead of the revised forecast, driven by renewals rather than new logos. Retention owes more to the support rota changes than to any pricing move.

Hiring stayed deliberately slow. Two backend roles remain open, and the design contractor engagement was extended by eight weeks to cover the referral programme.

Infrastructure spend fell for the third consecutive quarter after the storage migration, and the finance review flagged no new vendor risk this cycle.

The mobile release slipped by two weeks to absorb the payment provider's API deprecation. No customer-facing regression was reported after rollout.

Delivery and Platform

Churn analysis shows the cancellations concentrate in accounts that never completed onboarding. The lifecycle email experiment targets exactly that cohort next quarter.

Legal completed the data-processing addendum refresh, and the security questionnaire backlog is now empty for the first time since the enterprise push began.

The partnerships pipeline added three integrators, one of which brings a regulated market we could not previously serve directly.

Documentation rewrites reduced ticket volume in the two categories they targeted, confirming the hypothesis from the spring support audit.

Outlook

Internally, the platform team shipped the queue consolidation, retiring two services and simplifying the on-call rotation from five pagers to three.

Next quarter's plan concentrates investment on the self-serve funnel, holding enterprise features steady while the new pricing page is tested.

The board asked for a deeper view of expansion revenue; the data team will split expansion from renewal in the next reporting cycle.

Overall, the company enters the next quarter with a longer runway than planned and a narrower focus than last year, which is precisely the combination we wanted.
